To save als life he could not have kept his lowir lip from trembling nor the burning lears from his eyes. His humiliation was complete. A malevolent grin was en Droom's lace. His staring blue eyes looked with I great joy upon the shamed, beaten man in the stripes. The one thing that he had longed for and cherished had tome to pass. He had lived to see lames Bansemer utterly destroyed even in his own eyes.

"Father, I can't believe it. I can't tell rou how it burts me. I would willingly take your place if it were possible. Forgive me for deserting you." Grayion was saying incoherently when his lather lifted his face suddenly, a flerce, torrified look of understanding in the yes that flashed upon Elias Droom. Even as he clasped his son's hand in the bitterness of small joy his lips curied into a snarl of fury. "For which I'll repay you some day," cried the prisoner, a steady look in his eyes. "Now go away, all of you! I'm through with you. You've seen me. "le girl is satisfied. Go"-

"Nonsense, father," cried Graydon, visibly distressed by his father's anguish. "Elias said that you wanted to see us. Jane did not come out of curiosity. She is here to ask justice of you. She's not seeking vengeance."

Jane turned and walked swiftly away, followed by Droom, who rubbed his long fingers together and tried to look sympathetic. The interview that ensued between father and son was never to be forgotten by either. Graydon heard his father's bitter story in awed silence; heard him curse deeply and vindictively; heard all this and marveled at the new and heretofore unexposed side of his nature. There was something pathetic in the haggard face and the expressions of impotent rage. His heart softened when his father bared his shame to him and cried out against the fate which had brought them together on

"It doesn't matter, father," said Graydon hoarsely. "I deserted you, and I'm sorry. No matter what you've done to bring you here, I'm glad I've come to see you. I don't blame Elias. For awhile I'm afraid I rather held out/against coming. Now I am glad if your appeal does not go Sunbury, Ohia.
